Historical records show that the family has held a hallowed place in society since ancient times, as a social institution that ensures human perfection, progress, and stability. As a result, in matters of family and marriage, the family pays special attention to the norms of life, as well as the couple's roles and responsibilities. Family problems are resolved in accordance with the child's well-being, the maturity of the children, and the couple's wishes and interests. His experience in addressing difficulties and organizing lifestyle in a purposeful way gathered during the historical evolution of people's family life is significant.

Family and marriage issues have now reached the level of national importance in our society. Another proof of our point of view is the President of the Republic of Uzbekistan Sh. Mirziyoyev's Decree of February 2, 2018 "On measures to radically improve the activities in the field of women's support and strengthening the family institution." Family stability and family-marriage connections have long been important issues. To learn how to create their relationship, young family owners require a specific amount of time and the required psychological conditions. A couple should be expected to not only love one other, but also to create a harmonious family based on the development of family ties.

Literature Analysis And Methodologies

In the future years, the psychology of family life, family-marriage connections, family interaction relationships, their contradictions, divorces, and their consequences will become the focus of substantial research in the field of psychology. GB Shoumarov, MG Davletshin, and E. Gazyev are psychologists who work in this field. V.M

Karimova, N.A Soginov, H. Karimov, F.R. Rozikulov, and others have done important research. According to the findings of his research, G.B. Shoumarov, one of the country's leading psychiatrists, a strong family, a happy life, and harmonious coexistence are all key factors in their reunion. It recognizes the three-part conditional division of reciprocals:

1. Biologic;
2. Psychology;
3. Social Cohesion.

Interaction components. Family relations are built on a variety of bases, according to E. Goziyev's research in the field of family life: economic, ideological, emotional, moral, intellectual, kinship, closeness, and friendship. ## Results

Family conflicts are the most common feature of family interactions. Divorce is a modern social problem that is the "fruit" of conflict and its intensification. It is one of the most important social problems that human society faces. As a result, the scientific community is paying attention to the research of family problems and divorce both overseas and in Uzbekistan. Experts from a variety of professions are studying this issue, including lawyers, demographers, economics, sociologists, psychologists, and other specialists. A natural question arises when it comes to family issues. When a person grows up, it is natural for him to love his parents, others, and nature, to fall in love with him, and to marry with good intentions, which is why there are so many happy marriages. Perceptions of family roles and their differentiation, which form the basis of interactions in the family environment, have their own age, regional, and sexual characteristics, which are primarily the spiritual environment of each family, its national values, and traditions, and it also depends on the condition of the paintings. The incompatibility of the couple's behavior in the formulation and resolution of family issues, the lack of children, and love and devotion are sufficient. Lack of maintenance and intermediation of household chores, in terms of economic security shortcomings, jealousy and mistrust, parental couple relationship interference, incompatibility of worldviews and professions, as well as sexual immorality factors all play a role in causing conflicts in family relationships.

Discussion

The majority of young people reared in prosperous homes have their own plans for the future, and they want to make their parents' family ideal for their own family life. So perfect, that young people who wish to marry begin to lament that they have lost their path in marriage, astounded by the difficulties that come during the adaptation process if their marriage does not proceed as planned.

As a result, it's critical to highlight not only the positive aspects of the couple's connection, but also the psychological issues that arise in this relationship and that exist in real life. Only then can our children have a reasonable understanding of family life.

Many socio-psychological, ethnic, geographical, and sexual issues impede the formation of a young family. These psychological issues must be explained to young people in a straightforward and well-founded manner. This is the secret to avoiding family disagreements. Another component of the family is a lack of understanding among family members, which frequently leads to conflicts as a result of the inability to listen and comprehend each other throughout the communication process.

It should be mentioned that some arguments, contradictions, and contradictions that develop in a couple's relationship, mother-in-law's relationship, bride and groom's relationship, thoughts and perspectives, can be resolved constructively by mutual consent. In the minds of the younger generation, the socio-psychological and spiritual atmosphere in the family allows for profound and good conceptions of relationships.

Conclusion

It's worth emphasizing that the challenges of family life, family-marriage problems, and how extensive the research on their interactions is not on a scale, it's still a question of them not having an adequate solution. The socio-psychological characteristics of the formation process include family ties and their key components, the maturity of the couple and their adult offspring, interpersonal interactions in the family, and conflicts that develop within it. In the current circumstances, it is recommended to utilize family psychotherapy techniques and procedures in the coordination of family relationships, which will assist the family in functioning properly, studying the types of disputes and their causes, preventing them, and ensuring interpersonal connections.
